Why worry about data being stolen when your employees are giving it away?!

The screenshot shows a Netskope blog post. The header is teal with the Netskope logo and navigation links: SECURITY EVOLVED, PLATFORM, SOLUTIONS, CUSTOMERS, RESOURCES, and COMPANY. The main title is "There's a place that is scarier than the Dark Web". Below the title is a date "Jan 10 2018" and author "Bob Gilbert". A category tag "Cloud Security, Tools and Tips" is present. A "BACK TO POSTS" button is in the top right. The main image shows a person in a hoodie typing on a laptop in a dimly lit room. Below the image is an "Editor's note" about a webinar. On the right, there is a subscription form with a "Start Now!" button and a "Related Posts" section with a "READ MORE" button.

Editor's note: You can learn more about the bright web by joining our upcoming webinar where we will be sharing our research findings, providing a live demonstration, and walking through how Netskope can help your users safely maneuver the bright web.

I originally planned to focus this blog post on the dark web. Many of you reading this blog may know that the dark web is a well known part of the internet where many sites are not indexed by search engines.

Microsoft pulls then revives Docs.com search after complaints of exposed sensitive files

Security experts pointed to nu... which lets users share docum...

By Zack Whittaker for Zero Day | Mar

Microsoft has quietly removed a feature on its document sharing site Docs.com that allowed anyone to search through millions of files for sensitive and personal information.

Users had complained over the weekend on Twitter that anyone could use the site's search box to trawl through publicly-accessible documents and files stored on the site, which were clearly meant to remain private.

Among the files reviewed by ZDNet, and seen by others who tweeted about them, included password lists, job acceptance letters, investment portfolios, divorce settlement agreements, and credit card statements -- some of which contained Social Security and driving license numbers, dates of birth, phone numbers, and email and postal addresses.
